First, to determine what the "source" files for the project are, I simply modified the provided CollectFiles program to only grab files with the following specifications: does not have "test" in name; has "src" in name; ends in a file extension for one of the programming languages used. There was also an issue, where a personnel token was nearly uploaded, and I had to figure out how to deal with it. This required me using commands to delete unneeded commits, rebase my commits to access the one with the token, and append the fixed file (without the token). The other problems are, however, outside of my expertise since I completely lack any idea on how the github api works.
